Profile

I am a PhD candidate, theatre maker, visiting lecturer and activist, focussing on issues relating to forced migration. My practice research project engages with how autobiographical performance puts risky identities of young male refugees under pressure.

Alongside my PhD research I am a founder and co-Artistic Director of Phosphoros Theatre, a charity which makes nationally touring performance work with refugee actors who came to the UK as unaccompanied asylum seeking children. As well as co-creative leadership, I oversee the company’s participation and training work, including its Young Company at the Unicorn Theatre, national development workshops for social workers and other professionals working with refugees, and training programme for early career artists from refugee backgrounds. I have extensive experience working with refugee young people and adults aged 5-25 in both creative and advocacy based management positions. Between 2012-18 before starting my PhD, I worked for Paiwand, an Afghan refugee community organisation, in various roles including running a housing project for unaccompanied male refugees aged 16-21, and then senior management. Since 2018 I have been a visiting lecturer and tutor on Central’s BA Drama, Applied Theatre and Education and MA Applied Theatre courses, including co-running a new BA contemporary studies module called Theatre and Migration with Rebecca Hayes Laughton.

Abstract

My practice research examines how practices of self-authorship can perform care, solidarity and belonging, to establish alternative understandings of male refugee experience beyond their secure positions as 'service users'. Due to their extreme experiences of survival 'without papers', unaccompanied minors are often positioned in migration studies outside a Western paradigm of childhood, and are frequently misunderstood by host communities. The voices of refugees are often absented from research, performance and public discourse, enacting forms of erasure and silencing. My research considers how performance practices might reposition and/or destabilise dominant knowledge about young male refugees in order to restore agency and trouble discourses of suspicion, distrust and victimhood that have become associated with asylum seekers in general, and male unaccompanied minors specifically. Working collaboratively with activist-actors and young participants from Phosphoros Theatre, all of whom are current or former unaccompanied minors, as well as refugee young people around the UK, this research develops performance practices rooted in care and resistance, developing new ways for refugee actors to interact with and articulate their lived experience. My research reframes who gets to speak about forced migration, adolescence and solidarity, in what way and how.
